POWER IN SPORTS  THE MAN WHO REALLY RUNS BASEBALL
PLUS 14 OTHER HEAVY HITTERS

SPECIAL REPORT: SHOPPING FOR STEROIDS IN CHINA

NHL PREVIEW: CAN ANYONE ICE THE RANGERS?

WHY BILL BELICHICK CAN'T HELP HIMSELF

THE BEST COLLEGE QB IN HAWAII ... AND 49 OTHER STATES

HONOLULU HOTSHOT
COLT BRENNAN

BONUS! EXPN MAGAZINE INSIDE OUT FROM THE SHADOWS

These nine power brokers influence their sports in ways you've never heard about—until now.

Photography by Mark Kennedy
POWER IN SPORTS

DENNIS POPPE
When Bob Stoops is angry about a blown call or upset about a bowl assignment, he doesn’t call Nike’s Brand. He calls Poppe, the NCAA’s managing director for football and baseball. The three-decade NCAA vet oversees both officiating and championship series for football and baseball, and he makes it his business to know every college head coach, AD and assistant equipment manager in the country. He knows how to glad-hand the polls, too. The 55-year-old Poppe has overseen the College World Series since it days in obscurity. Now that it’s gone prime time, he’s been in talks with the city of Omaha to build the popular event fancy new digs.

MARK OF INFLUENCE For better or worse, Poppe helped bring both the BCS and instant replay to college football.

JUSTIN WOLFERS
The burgeoning field of sports economics is revealing sports’ dark side. Just ask Justin Wolfers, the Penn economist and provocateur. Before getting his Ph.D. from Harvard in 2001, the 34-year-old prof worked as a bookie’s runner in his native Australia. Now he’s teaching a class in Behavioral Economics and Prediction and Sports Betting Markets at Penn and ruffling plenty of feathers with two recent studies. The first, from 2005, used statistical patterns to purportedly uncover point-shaving in 32 hoops. The second, published in June, claimed racial bias by NBA refs.

MARK OF INFLUENCE When The New York Times profiled Wolfers’ study on NBA refs, David Stern trashed it as “a bum rap.” Several prominent economists came to Wolfers’ defense.

TOP COP
DAVID HOOTS
As a kid in Winston-Salem, N.C., Hoots worked at the local racetrack. These days, as NASCAR’s managing event director, he is the undisputed lord of all on America’s race days. His day begins a couple of hours before the green flag, when he gathers every driver and crew chief for an apron area meeting and lays down the ground rules for the day (sweats like cautions and pit road speeds are different at every track). Then Hoots, 57, heads up to the race control box. Armed with two walkie-talkies, he monitors nearly every facet of a NASCAR event: ordering caution flags and black flags, assessing pit road penalties, and, when necessary, reviewing instant replay to settle disputes. Even before engines start running, Hoots’ word is law.

MARK OF INFLUENCE “Hoots runs everything that happens until we go home,” says Jeff Gordon. “And he must have 10 sets of eyes, because he doesn’t miss a thing.”

SMOOTH FACE
CLIMBING EXPEDITIONS
Visit remote, exotic locations and learn valuable climbing tips, like how to use the mysterious “van der Waal force” to scurry up smooth vertical walls like a gecko!

Call 619-338-4244 to sign up for a once-in-a-lifetime adventure.
FOR AN EVEN BIGGER POWER GRAB, GO TO ESPN.COM

WARREN LegARIE

When an NBA franchise is looking for a new coach or GM—or both—you’re likely to see Legarie’s name pop up. The guy reps almost every AAU coach and front office personnel (like the Nuggets’ George Karl and Grizzlies’ GM Chris Wallace). He was also one of the first agents to land lucrative Euro deals for fringe-NBA talents in the 1990s. But his crowning achievement is founding the four-year-old Las Vegas Summer League, a two-week event to which nearly every NBA team brings its best young players. And where the talent goes, so do the suits follow. Every GM, coach and scout spends time in Vegas during the summer, and those touting for jobs might find an agent.

STEVE CLARKSON

Jose Montana entrusts both of his high school age sons to Clarkson’s tutelage. So did Jim Calhoun, father to three D1 QBs, who has called Clarkson “a dream maker.” The 45-year-old Clarkson turned the Q3 trade while starting for Jack Elway at San Jose State in the 1980s. After a brief CFL stint, the LA native returned home to tutor kids on signal-calling basics. Two decades later, he’s built himself a who’s-who roster of clients—Ben Rusthough, Matt Leinart, J.P. Losman, John Beck and, most recently, Jimmy Clausen—each of whom came to him in their teens looking for an edge. This season, four of Clarkson’s mentees will be D1 starters, and this summer he tutored 2008’s top high school QB prospect, Terrell Pryor.

MARK OF INFLUENCE Clarkson commands $3K plus travel expenses for a private talent evaluation, and an additional $1K or more per four-hour session.
ARCHITECT

JANET MARIE SMITH

As the senior VP of development and planning for the Red Sox, Smith is in charge of Fenway Park's renovations. Over the past five years, she has overseen vast improvements in the fan experience at one of baseball's oldest and most overcrowded ballparks. With expanded concourses, less congestion and additional seats perched above the Green Monster, Fenway has retained its 95-year-old charm while adapting to modern demands for more space and amenities. It's the same approach that Smith used with Atlanta's Turner Field and before that, Baltimore's Camden Yards, two retro parks that proved a fan-friendly stadium can evolve with the city's downtown urban center.

MARK OF INFLUENCE Since Camden Yards opened in 1992, a dozen throwback ballparks have helped revitalize urban areas.

STEVE GREENBERG

The son of Hall of Famer Hank Greenberg lasted a few years in the minors after graduating from Yale in 1970. He later became a player agent, negotiating baseball's first-ever weight-related incentive clause for Dill Medlock in 1981. From 1999 to 1993, Greenberg rose to prominence as the deputy commissioner of Major League Baseball and the right-hand man to then-commissioner Fay Vincent. These days as part of the New York City investment firm Allen & Co, the 50-year-old is whom major league owners call when they need advice on setting franchise values. He recently brokered the sales of the Braves, Brewers and Reds and helped the Mets negotiate naming rights for their new stadium, Citi Field.

MARK OF INFLUENCE In 1995, Greenberg co-founded the Classic Sports Network, which was bought by ESPN and renamed ESPN Classic. Eight years later he founded CSN, which was sold to CBS in 2006.

DOLLAR MAN

BOB LAMONTE

"Before we got involved, coaches were making $360,000," says Lamonette. "Now they're making $3 million." But the agent doesn't just fill his coaching clients' coffers. He also brokered deals that give them the kind of control most coaches dream about. The 62-year-old agent's roster boasts Charlie Weis and an army of A-list NFL coordinators—Mike Martz, Mike Singletary, Jim Mora Jr. and Mike Sherman among them. But it's head guys such as Mike Holmgren, John Gruden, Andy Reid, Brad Childress, John Fox and Mike Nolan who make Lamonette one of the league's most influential insiders. The contracts he brokered for Holmgren in Seattle, Reid in Philly and Sherman during his run with the Pack set a new gold standard, combining multimillion dollar compensation with unprecedented front office control.

MARK OF INFLUENCE For the 2007 season, Lamonte's head-coaching clients will rake in somewhere north of $36 million in contract money.

WADE UILES

In the days leading up to a PGA Tour event, you'll find Uiles camped out nearby in his Spartan TaylorMade equipment trailer quietly tweaking and building drivers for TaylorMade's 60 touring pros, including John Daly, Sergio Garcia, Scott Verplank and Justin Rose. Millions of dollars in prizemoney ride on each pro's comfort with his club, so Uiles is in high demand. His custom builds are based on individual preference (he stores each pro's likeness and dislikes in a laptop) and can construct an entire new driver in less than 10 minutes. His handiwork helped power Garcia and Verplank to top-five finishes at last month's Tour championship.

MARK OF INFLUENCE Escaping the own-sponsorship trap, many TaylorMade pros have been known to sneak by Uiles' trailer in search of a club tune-up.